

me to think I would rather be excused from being introduced to the whole business. We were very fortunate and received no injuries during this picnic, and were favored with a good, steady wind that carried us to the Cape of Good Hope where a storm was awaiting us that caused us to be thankful that we were in a good ship, with a captain and crew that understood their business. Never in my life have I seen such heavy seas as we experienced in our passage of that cape. One great advantage over Cape Horn is that the weather is less cold, but the wind has considerable power, nevertheless. However, after three days roughing it night and day, with scarcely any rest, we were glad to see a little blue sky once more and a lull in the tempest. But this is the kind of weather that makes sailors, and makes them see that orders given by officers should be promptly and skillfully obeyed. After doubling the Cape our course was N. N. W., and we had good weather from there to the coast where we were being detained.

days. The sun gave us a good scorching at that time, and when the breeze sprang up we were delighted to be once more out on our way for we were homeward bound, and a sailor is very impatient then and anxious to see his home and friends again, and any little delay causes all the more heart sore. But, as the days are frequently heard about there being some Jonah aboard who is the cause of the ill luck. But, in good time, the right kind of wind came and in the joy caused by one man showing a wake astern, all the little unpleasant delays are forgotten and Jack is sure his sweetheart is waiting at the tow-line and is pulling the ship into port, and it will not be long before he will see his black eyed Susan again.

We had a good run from the line to the spot where the pilot boarded us, and when he steps on board the captain resigns his place to him, and generally if he has been up through a firestorm watch, goes below and turns in to dream of home.

We engaged a tug boat outside which towed us through the narrows and remained fast to us until we reached Penn's dock, Brooklyn, where we made fast, and, upon the mates saying "That will do men," the voyage is finished and bags and chests are carried over the side to the vagrants of the saloon keepers, at which they have concluded to stop until they have had a good time and are ready for another trip to the deep.

Your humble servant, whose home was in Boston, does not allow much time to pass before he is on his way home. Now, as we have been around the World, I will conclude with a word to the boy readers of these sketches.

My advice to them, if they feel inclined to make that trip, is to get into a good business on land, and, by faithful application to such business, possess themselves of the means to pay their passage, for, by so doing, they will escape many of the hardships which William has had to suffer during this little excursion.

FRANK E. WILLIAMS.

HOUSEKEEPER.

One of the most practical and efficient women whom I have ever known—devoted to the domestic economies, the improvement of a moderate fortune, and with social ambition of a prudent type—was my intimate acquaintance Mrs. Martin Kellogg. I remember her vividly as she was at seventeen, a pretty girl, slender in figure, with an erect, graceful and active carriage, and a sprightly, yet self-possessed manner. She was the youngest child of the family, and her father and mother, growing old, were most tenderly devoted to her. She never left them, and she brought her life she occupied the house in which she was born, and which finally became her own. It was a substantial home, and extremely gloomy as I first remember it.

She had taste and ingenuity, and completely revolutionized the interior, and the outside, also, in time, quietly bringing about changes which not one of the older children would have dared to propose. She married early a young man known from childhood, an energetic young business man. From a girl she had remarkable skill and taste in dress; she was a skillful needlewoman, and knew what suited her, and gave the impression of personal elegance with the least possible expenditure of money. In all the household arts she soon became an expert. There were no failures in her cooking; everything "came out right." Her house was a model of neatness and order, her even habits were exact and careful, and by a systematic timeliness all the work of the house was so completely done that the need of it never seemed obvious. She had, apparently, abundant leisure; in actual fact she accomplished a great deal with her hands, keeping only one servant, but it was done at those hours when it was unlikely to conflict with any social claims. Her children were always well dressed, always most carefully managed; her garden and her showy window plants, everything that she possessed, received its due, and bore

There was no lack of . None of exact fulfillment of what she called duty. When she aged, father lay unconscious in all the chill and horror of a frightful accident, she renewed the flowers in her room and dusted her rooms with precisely the same careful scrupulosity as was her daily wont. A funeral in the house (even her mother's) was an occasion for the strictest and most effective propriety. In every great crisis of life the regular measures of music and cuisine was dealt out as usual. To those differently constituted, there may have seemed at times to be a lack of feeling—but who can measure feeling?

She was successful. In all that she undertook she succeeded manifestly and unobtainably. She was admired, deferred to, envied. She had some decided business talents, a little private power grew in her hands into a fair competency. When her father died and left her the bulk of his property, she was a rich woman. To be sure there was dissatisfaction among the heirs; he was an old man and feeble in mind, there was a suspicion of unfair means and improper influence, but the will was not contested; the best lawyers were engaged on her side. And, as among her near relatives there is a coldness toward her; she speaks severely of them, contemptuously of some, that they

What is the outcome of her life? A selfish and hard-hearted prosperity. She has none of the sweeter and finer graces of womanhood. She has been a stern mother, but not sympathetic or tender. Her only son was peevish and discontented as a little boy, selfish, narrow, and suspicious as he grew older. Under her rigid rule no generous nature, noble as it is possible, she has no faith in the higher reaches of human nature, and unselfish motives are inconceivable to her. What is the influence of such a woman worth? With all her practical efficiency, what is her value to society and to her family? She is undoubtedly useful in many ways, but it is a question whether her example will do any harm or more good. Nature like hers may be useful in ideal and deny all its claims, but unless we make the material objects of life a means to an end, and not the end itself, there is little blessedness in attainment. It may be that in the final account we shall find what we call great wisdom down as losses.—Country Gentleman.

Give Them a Chance.

That is to say, your lungs. Also all your breathing machinery. Very wonderful machinery it is. Not only the larger air passages, but the thousands of little tubes and cavities leading from them.

When these are clogged and choked with matter which ought to be your lungs cannot half do their work.

And what they do they cannot do well.
Cough is cold, cough, croup, pneumonia, catarrh, consumption or any of the family of throat and nose and lung obstructions, all are bad. All ought to be got rid of. There is just one way to get rid of them. That is to take Refriger's German Syrup, which may directly kill each cell that contains a germ.
Even if everything else had failed you you may depend upon this for certain.
